She was slight, fair, and in the moonlight, pale as a creature in dreams. Was this one of the hours of his fabled paradise? There was no spot in all the Heaven of Mohammed fit for an angel like this. Away, like the sand on a whirlwind, like the clouds before the sun, like the stars at daybreak—away swept all his faith in Islam, and in an instant the Sheik Houssein was an idolater worshipping, as a thousand greater than he have done, the beauty of a woman. Perhaps he might have quenched his thirst for the unknown at some other fountain: but this was not enough now. He had found that wherewith to fill the void, and he was content.

Love was a new emotion-a sensation he had never before experienced; and it satisfied him. Did she love him! That was a question which never occured to him. What did he care for that. He was looking for employment for his own soul, and he had found it; and that was enough.

The tradition goes on to describe his long crossing of the desert—how he lingered among the hills of Sinai; how he led them by Akaba and Petra, and detained them many weeks at the city of Rocok; how the fair English girl faded slowly away, for she was dying when she came to Egypt; and how weary, well nigh dead, he caried her to the Holy City, and pitched their tent by the mouned over her with the zealous care of a father or a brother, and the quick heart of the lady saw it and understood it all. And sometimes he would try in broken words to tell her of his old belief, and she would read in his hearing sublime promises and glorious hopes that were in a language he knew nothing of, but which he half understood from her uplifted eye and countenance. How he worshiped that matchless eye!

WHEN WE HUSKED THE CORN.

October scorching fires the trees, And naked lies the shivering vine; While dimly o'er the distant sea The fading lights of summer shine. Along the lawn the negro blows Deep summers on his noonday horn, And homeward troop the girls and beaus From husking of the corn.

I mind me well that autumn day, When, five and twenty years ago, We turned out labor into play, and husked the corn for neighbor Lowe. Ah! wife, we were the blithest pair That e'er to wedded love were born; For I was gay, and you were fair, A husking of the corn.

O, bow we sung, and how we laughed! Our hearts sat lightly on our lips, As we the golden elder quaffed, And passed the bowl with rosty And when sly hints of love went round, You glanced at me with pouting scorn, Yet smiled, although you fain would frown,

Then when I found the scarlet car, And claimed the old traditioned kiss, You hade me not approach to near. And pleaded that and pleaded this-Away you fled, and I pursued, Till all too faint you were to warn, A husking of the corn?
